3. BRIEF DESCRIPTION :

Ocean plays very important role in linkage to the carbon cycle of the planet earth. There are both the natural and anthropogenic sources which regulate the carbon cycle categorized as sources and sinks. The biological pump is one of the important mechanism for the carbon sequestration to the deep ocean. Phytoplankton, the recognized marine primary producers utilize new and recycled nutrients to convert the dissolved inorganic carbon to particulate organic carbon (POC) [Eppley and Peterson, 1979; Longhurst and Harrison, 1989]. A fraction of POC is then exported vertically to deep waters by various mechanisms as consumption by zooplankton and fish, excretion of fecal pellets and by Particle aggregation and sinking.

4. SCOPE & OBJECTIVES :

- (1) To develop regional algorithms for POC basing on in situ water sample analyzed data, radiometer and backscatter meter.
- (2) To establish the linkage of POC to optical properties and altogether to phytoplankton taxa and chlorophyll-a pigment.
- (3) To generate POC images basing on developed algorithms.
- (4) Validation of the developed algorithms.
- (5) To study the seasonal variability of POC over ASea.
- (6) Generation of POC maps for operational product.

5. NEED ASPECT & PROGRAM LINKAGE :

This proposal is needed to understand the organic carbon variability in particulate form (POC) in the water of Arabian Sea with linkage to the phytoplankton taxonomy. There is till now no algorithm for estimating remote sensing based POC for Indian water. The in situ data need to be collected from different coastal and offshore water locations adjoining Gujarat and in the Arabian Sea water for different seasons.

This work, developed algorithm and operational product brought out from the proposed project shall be useful for coming Oceansat-3 OCM utilization program.
